Green transformation affects labour markets significantly and changes the demand for (new) skills, jobs, and products. This anthology by the European Network on Regional Labour Market Monitoring provides evidence and lessons on the greening of the regional and local labour markets in (regional) case studies as well as discusses concepts and tools for analysing and measuring this process. Also, the authors elaborate on the relevance and challenges which greening poses for companies and the role which green skills and digitisation play in this process. Therefore, the anthology is of vital interest to stakeholders in politics, labour market observation or research, academia, as well as regulators.
